1	1879: 29 Jan. 8 pm.	J. M. Waters	Intimidation otherwise than by threatening letters or notices.	John M. Waters was returning in his rattle from Carrigut to his home in Midland, and when passing through Gortagh Wood was stopped by three men, two of whom he believed had guns, and, presenting these at him on each side, demanded his name. On being informed, the man on the left side caught the dark horse of the rattle and broke it; the other struck the horse with what appeared to be the butt-end of a gun, and said, "Lord, it is a pity it's not Drooping." The supposition is that the men were lying in wait for Captain Drooping (agent to Earl of Linton), who was expected to return that way, for the purpose of working him. A general antipathy existed towards the Captain on the Linton estate, and it was supposed he had been afforded police protection since the date of this outrage. Owing to the darkness of the night Waters was unable to describe any of the men.	- - all - -	- - all.

On the day of the occurrence Biddy McGovern sat fire to some old turf, which is claimed to be his. Mary Anne Durness went to extinguish it, when loud words ensued, which attracted the neighbours to the spot, when a quarrel of the most desperate description took place, and ended only when both parties were unable, from injuries sustained, to fight any more. The shot broke the window and lodged in the wall over the fire-place. Immediately afterwards a bottle filled with gun or blasting powder, and wrapped round with twisted cord, was thrown through the window, and exploded in the sitting-room (which was unoccupied) and caused much damage. A similar explosion took place outside. Subsequently a letter threatening Wallace was found nailed to the house posted on a stick. Wallace had been very active in inducing the landlord to erect a fence on the property, and a dispute as to the compensation for loss of the land to be accepted by it is the supposed motive for the outrage.	- - nil - -	- - nil.

Hamilton had combined to ask an abatement in their rent, and if their request was refused, each promised not to pay any. Mr. Witter, who was the first to enter the office, failed to keep his word, paid his rent, and in consequence some people came to the place during the night, burnt three stacks of corn in his haggard, and left a threatening notice suspended from a tree, warning him of his danger for what he had done, and threatening the landlord. 25	15 Dec.	Denis Brennan and Charles Brennan	- - ditto - -	In April 1879, Hugh Brennan sold the tenements of a small farm to a man named Edward Delorty, as condition that, on the 1st January 1880, he would hand over the farm to the gentlemen, Denis and Charles Brennan, should they be able to release it. The latter were making preparations to purchase the farm, which fact was conveyed to Denis Brennan (their uncle, and son to Hugh), who is a blacksmith, working at his trade in Greenock, and who intended to get and live on his father's farm. The young men (Denis and Charles) received a letter bearing the Greenock post mark, and signed by Denis Brennan.
